BIO

Frank Abdale has nearly twenty years as an executive and consultant in the nonprofit sector with extensive experience in strategic planning, capacity building, policy development and fundraising – particularly in corporate, foundation and individual donor development.

A proven innovator, Abdale has demonstrated his ability to help lead agencies and clients to higher levels of achievement than initially conceived. He has helped build and lead non-traditional and effective alliances with partners that include a mix of funders, nonprofits, consumers, government agencies, academia, community partners, and a variety of professional and technical experts on local, regional and national levels.

As Executive Director of the Association of Nutrition Services Agencies (ANSA) from 2002-2008 Abdale built an effective advocacy program from the ground up. He developed and introduced legislation into the House of Representatives and the U.S. Senate calling for a White House Conference on Food and Nutrition in 2010, founded the National Nutrition Collaborative, served as a member of National Anti-Hunger Organizations (NAHO), developed several policy-related publications, coordinated a grassroots and national advocacy effort, built partnerships that brought nutrition for the chronically ill into the larger worlds of senior nutrition and the anti-hunger movement, and launched a growing international program focused on nutrition and HIV/AIDS in South Africa, Namibia, Rwanda and Ethiopia.

Abdale is also a gifted author, teacher and public speaker. Today, Frank is head of Abdale Consulting, a national consulting agency based in New York City. The primary goal of Abdale Consulting is to help dynamic leaders develop, articulate and implement their vision.
